Atkins Plucks New War Song from American Chestnut Tree

Tommy, Tired of "Tipperary," Lightens Toil of Trenches by Inquiring if "That's Mr. Riley"-Brooklyn Guardsmen and School Head Fight Over Anti-War Ditty.

Despite President Wilson's plea for the following as the official military neutrality the United States has again version: furnished the British army with a battle song, the inspiration of its victories in the field. "Are You the O'Reilly?" the song that all the soldiers are singing, now that "Tipperary" is no longer in vogue in the trenches, is an American product.

Like "Tipperary," the new song originsted on the stage in this country, and the burlesque stage at that. When Harrigan and Hart were as familiar household words as Montgomery and Stone are now, some twenty-five years ago, "Is That Mr. Riley?" was one of the songs they made famous. This was the 13th

The soldiers always end the song by shouting the last two words.

War song criticism is by no means confined to the nations actually fighting. There is an anti-war song war now raging in Brooklyn. It all started because Alexander Fichandler, principal of Public School 165, teaches the children to sing "I Didn't Raise My Boy To Be a Soldier."

When Major Sydney Grant, of the 18th Coast Artillery, of Brooklyn, visited the school and heard the children's voices blended in the above peace anthem he was very indignant. When he saw a picture in the hall depicting a little girl looking up at a soldier in full uniform and asking, "Papa, are you going to kill some other girl's papa?" the major left in dismay and sent in a complaint to the Board of Education. It was a formulation to the Board of Education of Education and the confidence of Education of Education and the confidence of Education and the confidence of Education and the confi and sent in a complaint to the Board of Education.
